BACK TO FUNDAMENTALS

During the past few years there has been a development and expansion of high school courses of study. A movement to socialize time-honored teaching routines has gained favor. We are prone to commend the effort to improve and make practical the classroom procedures. However, it should be pointed out that the tests given our young men both before and after induction into the armed services, reveal a need for our public school system to get back to certain fundamentals. The first fundamental should be to see that every boy and girl learns to read and write. The percentage of illiteracy in America and in Virginia is alarmingly high. And, so far as we know, is without excuse. And in next order, every boy and girl should have basic skill in handwriting, in spelling and in arithmetic. A recent report indicates that sixty-eight per cent of college freshmen who took the tests for Navy Ensigns were unable to pass the arithmetic reasoning tests. The failures were not border-line cases but far below the passing grade. A shortage is also seen in the fundamental knowledge of geography and the Government is now using the facilities of a university to train groups of officers in this needed subject in a global war. Thus, we might possibly draw the conclusion that basic knowledge of reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, history, and geography remain the most important items in any course of study.

"AS SOON AS NOVEMBER ELECTIONS ARE OVER!"

We are tired of reading and hearing so and so will be done "as soon as the November elections are over."

Why should Congress play politics with vital war decisions

It is currently rumored that men of 18 and 19 years of age will be taken into the Army "as soon as the November elections are over."

Why make a political issue out of that decision? Induction into the armed service should not be made a matter of political expediency.

Likewise, we hear rumors that there will be nation-wide rationing of gas "as soon as the November elections are over."

Some of our Congressmen and Senators are trying to make political capitol of some phase of the present gasoline rationing. Every day we read where Congressman X has "gone to bat" for a group of traveling salesman, or has taken up the torch for or against national gas rationing. Morale is not being helped by this attitude. Our guess is that Mr. Henderson has the confidence of the people as a fair administrator doing his best with curtailed funds and one of the toughest problems on the Home Front.

THE PRICE WE WOULD PAY IF THIS WAR SHOULD BE LOST

It is a little late to find fault with the schools long used in American schools, but there is some truth in the complaint that glowing accounts of American achievement's in the wars described in many of those texts have led countless pupils to believe that the nation is unbeatable under any circumstances.

American experience in the First World War, when the shipping lanes of the Atlantic were open to the nation's combat materials and a major and easily accessible front already had been established by military allies, served to foster that optimism.

Those who believe that events of the past assure the United States of victory in this war need to be jolted from their opinions on occasion. This task was admirably attempted recently by Col. Marion Rushton, assistant executive to the Under Secretary of War, in an address before the Alabama State Bar Association at Montgomery, Colonel Rushton said:

"All our foreign wars to date have been pushovers. But this war is no pushover, and before it is over every last one of us must make sacrifices in our way of living, in our possessions and, yes, in our blood."

THE UNEXPECTED

"Who would have thought one year ago that any such misfortune could happen to me." Remarks of this kind are heard from some persons who have suffered some special loss or anxiety due to the war.

For very many of our people dark clouds have suddenly spread over the horizon. Some had sons who have fallen in battle. Some have lost their jobs, or their business has closed up due to wartime conditions. Some of them live in constant anxiety because their boys have gone they know not where in the service of their country, and some of them fear some tragic message. We should feel the warmest sympathy for such folks.

We have to face the fact that life constantly brings us up against unexpected anxieties, difficulties, and tragedies. The main difference is that now the trouble has come to the whole nation, so that all are more or less affected, while in ordinary times the anxieties and troubles came to individuals separately.

In ordinary life people are constantly falling sick or suffering from accident, or many of them are losing their jobs, or seeing their business go to pieces. Human nature has to be prepared for these exigencies, and when it is a necessary to meet them resolutely when they come.

People emerge from these experiences of trial stronger than before. Life seems meant to give us these forms of discipline, and hard experience is a part of the development of human character. It there was nothing hard, toilsome, fearful, or dangerous in life, we should be too weak and pampered.

So let us not be despondent about whatever losses or suffering or anxiety we undergo. There is an end to these experiences, and they leave us stronger and better equipped for life.— From Peninsula Enterprise.

LETTERS

Editor Times-Virginian,
Appomattox, Va.
Dear Sir:

I have noticed in many newspapers publishing within the area covered by the Philadelphia region of the War Production Board a number of letters from citizens who are confused by certain phases of the important overall salvage drives being conducted throughout the nation today.

For instance, some letters have appeared concerning the recent scrap rubber collection which would give the reading public the impression that after they donate the scrap.....

(1) Nothing is done with it.

(2) Certain dealers make an exorbitant profit.

(3) The ultimate disposal of this scrap has not been properly arranged for.

The reason the public sees scrap in public collection depots whether rubber, iron, or mixed metals, is that it is manifestly impossible immediately to convert all of this scrap to its ultimate end use. When a scrap shipped from the collection depots immediately at the converting plants would be swamped with material and would not receive the steady flow of scrap which they require. It would also place a great burden on transportation facilities.

The present plans for the collection of scrap have been carefully worked out to provide as continuous a flow as possible to the mills and to the factories converting scrap. This means that the public will probably continue to see some particularly in the hands of the automobile graveyards and scrap iron dealers for a long period, but it does not mean that there is not a constant turnover of this scrap. It is the desire of the War Production Board to keep these dealers actively collecting scrap and turning over their stock piles at certain regular periods.

The above is particularly true in the automobile graveyards. It is necessary when an automobile is scrapped to remove various items from the car and then to segregate different types of scrap available. The usefulness of the automobile graveyard for this purpose is readily apparent.

As you know our material shortages are such that they already have caused some industrial dislocations. There will be more dislocations of a most serious order unless the salvage campaigns are continuously successful.

Dear Sir:

You will recall that some weeks ago, there was right much criticism of Mr. Leon Henderson, Price Administrator, by some members of Congress, especially by some of the New Deal Congressmen, because of some appointments he made. He was accused of appointing some Republicans to office that had run against some New Dealer in some election. Personally I think Mr. Henderson is doing a fine job. Nobody ever pleased Congress. They pass a law and then cuss the one that tries to enforce it. If some of those New Deal Congressmen would come to this neighborhood they would find that no Republicans had been appointed around here. To my knowledge no Republican in this county has ever been asked to contribute to the Red Cross or the U. S. O., much less to serve in any official capacity.

Very truly yours,
J. T. Almond.

MODERN MOLLY PITCHERS

WASHINGTON.—It is a long shot from the molded bullet of the past to the high-powered artillery projectile of today. But as women poured the molten lead into crude molds to make those bullets, so women today work on the modern goliaths.

More and more women are taking their places in wartime industries, working to put into the hands of their men the weapons that will win victory. These modern processes are complex. Each worker does only a small part of one of them. She may never see the finished product. She cannot put it into the hands of the man who uses it. But her work is just as important, for without it the product would not be finished.

For example, a primer is a little brass cup that contains the pellet charge—a small explosion wafer pressed to a foiling disk. It must also be set under a fine anvil through which the flame passes from the lighted pellet into the vent hole in the cartridge case to ignite the powder. The foiling paper must be shellacked. It must be pressed over the primer. This is done by hand. Then the small anvils must be placed in the primer cups by hand. This is just one small process, seemingly simple, but on the dexterity of the worker depends the effectiveness of the missle.

In many plants women are employed as testers. They do such intricate jobs as adjusting hairsprings in strobo-glope machines and projecting fuse parts on comparators or shadowgraphs — processes which would have alarmed their grandmothers. Some women are given an entire year's training as time-fuse makers so they can be transferred from one operation to another; still others load primer heads and pack powder in bags.

"There are by no means all the things that women do today to supply ammunition to the soldiers, but they indicate how the modern women emulate the Molly Pitcher of Revolutionary fame who rammed the powder down her husband's cannon at the Battle of Monmouth.

IN MEMORIAM

CARTER: In loving memory of J. W. Carter, who departed this life four years ago, August 24, 1938:

He is gone but not forgotten;
Never shall his memory fade,
Sweetest thoughts shall linger
Around the grave where he is laid.
The flowers we placed upon his grave
May wither and decay,
But love for him who lies beneath
Will never fade away.
We have missed him every moment
Since the day he passed away,
We hope some day to meet him
in Heaven,
Where all tears are wiped away.
